Looking Back: The Morro Castle Tragedy

On September 8, 1934, while traveling from Havana, Cuba to New York, a fire broke out on the ocean liner off Long Beach Island. As passengers and crew tried to escape the burning hull, chaos ensued with 30-knot winds and rough seas further compounding the situation. Despite rescue efforts from both citizens on shore and other vessels, including 72 rescued by John and James Bogan from Bogan's Basin, 135 out of the 549 people onboard the Morro

Castle lost their lives

Many of the deceased were unintentionally killed by the very devices that were supposed to save them. Some were knocked unconscious by their life preservers when they hit the water then subsequently drowned, while others were killed instantly when their necks broke from the impact of the preservers hitting the water.

The burnt and empty hull drifted north and beached itself directly parallel to Convention Hall in Asbury Park. It became somewhat of a tourist attraction until it was dismantled and salvaged the following March.

In 2009, the Asbury Park Historical Society dedicated a monument on the south side of the iconic Convention Hall to remember both the victims from the disaster and to honor "the many courageous Jersey Shore residents who risked their own lives or provided assistance to rescue Morro Castle survivors from rough seas and recover the victims who washed ashore or who were pulled from the sea." The New Jersey Maritime Museum has an entire room dedicated to artifacts from the Morro Castle, and two lifejackets recovered from the ocean liner are a part of the Point Pleasant Historical Museum's collection.

Point Pleasant Historical Society

Serving Point Pleasant and Point Pleasant Beach

Each month of this "school year" of our seven news letters, September through June, we will feature one decade of historical events. Example: September will cover the years of the 1930's, October the 1940's, etc. June will conclude with the 1990's. Most information will be culled from the book, 350 YEARS of NEW JERSEY HISTORY, by Joseph G. Bilby, James M. Madden, and Harry Ziegler. (2014) Besides statewide events, efforts will be made to interject local and shore area history. — Compiled by Len Ludovico 1930-The census reported New Jersey's population as 4,041,334.

- Construction began on an elevated roadway between Newark & Jersey City: the Pulaski Skyway.
